Abstract. This paper explores how Mexican companies in different industries have achieved international expansion, while at the same time preserving local elements in executing their strategies. For this initial stage of research, the analysis focuses on two companies: a) Grupo Bimbo, the number one company in the bakery industry worldwide and b) KidZania, one of the world’s top indoor family entertainment centers. The research methodology is based on in-depth interviews with CEOs and key executives from the two companies done over a period of more than ten years. We have also used secondary data such as press releases and case studies. By contrasting their strategies and comparing them with those of other multinationals like Ford Motor Company and Santander Bank, we identified major issues that we condensed into 10 key insights. Understanding how these companies have struggled and succeeded in gaining international markets can help other companies tailor their own strategies. Our argument is that the typical simplified international expansion process is insufficient when companies need to compete in the global arena. Becoming an MNC implies handling an entire ecosystem: building local presence, establishing joint ventures or alliances with local companies, recruiting local talent, developing new business models, reshaping the value proposition, developing new brands or introducing traditional ones with a local flavor, and understanding the supply chain and routes to market. Therefore, a number of aspects have to be taken into consideration beyond just simply selecting a market. For certain companies in emerging markets, making the decision to grow internationally was not initially in their strategic vision, but economic liberalization in their home country and the threat of being purchased by an MNC from a developed country triggered the decision. There is a learning process in international expansion, and trial and error is common and useful. The challenge for companies after conquering new markets is how to successfully transfer the enhanced processes and new skills acquired to strengthen the whole organization, both locally and abroad.

Introduction

A global economic boom, unprecedented in modern economic history, has been under way as the drive for efficiency, productivity, and open, unregulated markets sweeps the world. Powerful economic, technological, industrial, political, and demographic forces are converging to build the foundation of a new global economic order on which the structure of a one-world economic and market system will be built. Acknowledging the complexity of today’s business environment motivated this research.

This article explores international expansion strategies of Mexican companies that have gone global in different industries, while at the same time preserving local elements in executing their strategies.

In the initial stage of the research, the study focuses on two companies: a) Grupo Bimbo, the number one company in the bakery industry worldwide and b) KidZania, one of the world’s top indoor family entertainment centers. Both companies, Grupo Bimbo and KidZania, are among the top 25 Global Mexican Companies according to the CNN-Expansion 2015 rankings (see Table 1).

Through benchmarking with other companies and a deep and longitudinal analysis of these companies we have identified 10 key insights that should be considered in elaborating an international growth strategy.

Theoretical framework

Helmut Maucher (2009) identifies four basic strategies that a company can utilize for achieving said growth: 1) Strengthen the products that have not achieved desired levels of market participation, 2) Promote the growth of products with those that have reached a leadership position, 3) Enter new national markets, and 4) Reinforce the company’s position in countries where there was previously no presence.

Lower growth at home means that companies for whom until now the domestic market was sufficient to meet their goals have an additional impetus to pursue sales abroad (Kumar & Steenkamp, 2013). The signing of so many trade agreements between regions and among countries brings CEOs and senior executives a new challenge when they want to keep their growth pace. For them, if they want to compete in a global arena it becomes mandatory to at least explore the fourth strategy recommended by Maucher (2009).

In today’s global environment, there are not many emerging market brands that are considered global brands. It seems that developed countries’ brands have the world all to themselves. This fact was confirmed recently: out of the 100 Best Global Brands from Interbrand’s 2015 Report, only three are from developing economies: Huawei #88 and Lenovo #100, from China; and Corona #93, from Mexico.

Jan-Benedict E.M. Steenkamp (2014) pointed out that: “Despite the rise of the emerging markets, especially China, no emerging market brands are viewed as brands that are beloved by consumers in advanced economies.”
Many questions arise when companies need to compete outside of their own national markets – be it in the emerging or developed world:
- Why are there so few emerging market brands in leading global positions?
- How can emerging market brands/companies gain a more relevant position in countries where they have no presence?
- How can emerging market firms compete outside of their own national markets?

One of the main challenges is defining the business model that will be implemented in the new selected market. Top management must answer the following questions:
- Should we go with the same business model?
- Should we offer the same portfolio of products?
- Should we enter the new market with the same brands?

These are some of the tough strategic choices to be made in the journey toward internationalization. This paper explores the difficult decisions that emerging market CEOs face when they decide to pursue an international growth strategy.

This study draws heavily from the internationalization process model (IPM), also known as the Uppsala model. The IPM places organizational learning at the center of its theorizing, and explains each specific foreign investment decision in the context of a firm’s previous actions and accumulated learning (Meyer & Thajjongrak, 2013; Reddy & Naik, 2011).

Kolb (1984) has identified four types of learning:
1) Concrete experience
2) Reflective observation
3) Abstract conceptualization
4) Active experience.

Our focus is on the concrete experience and active experimentation of two companies in developing their international growth strategies (Watson & Chatterjee, 2006). Gaining experiential knowledge about foreign business environments such as knowledge about customers, competitors, and regulatory authorities, is a core concept in the IPM. Lack of knowledge is one of the most relevant obstacles to successful international business. Acquiring this knowledge of the new market is difficult if not gleaned through direct engagement in the new environment.

Therefore, we stress that the internationalization of firms is a dynamic learning process, in which decision makers should take into consideration the results of their previous decisions. The essence of IPM is in the underlying processes of organizational learning that explain the evolution of MNEs over time (Meyer & Thaijongrak, 2013).

According to Khanna, Palepu and Sinha (2005), CEOs and senior leadership teams at MNCs acknowledge that globalization (or regionalization) is the most critical challenge they face today. However, both practitioners and academics are aware of the difficulty in identifying internationalization strategies and selecting the best countries in which to do business. In addition to this obstacle or difficulty, \textit{globalness} has become a stronger quality than nation of origin. Nevertheless, consumers still prefer brands from countries that are considered to have a particular expertise or that offer a local flavor. These facts are the key drivers for research into internationalization processes in emerging markets and are the inspiration for this explorative article.

\textbf{Methodology}

Using ground theory, we built our research mainly on secondary data and deep analysis of two illustrative case studies (10 years of documented information and analysis). We carried out in-depth interviews with Bimbo and KidZania’s top executives and owners, consulted press releases, and analyzed their published public information (websites).

The first company, Grupo Bimbo, is in the bakery industry and the second company, KidZania, is in the indoor family entertainment centers industry. According to Reddy and Naik (2011) most of the research related to firms’ internationalization is focused in MNEs rather than small-medium sized enterprises in emerging economies, which play an important role in the growth of this type of economy.

Following this section are brief descriptions of the two companies. The case studies focus on these two Mexican companies, both of which have been able to implement successful internationalization processes. We have assessed these processes based on their concrete experience and active experimentation. Finally, benchmarked with other Mexican companies that have been successful in their endeavour to go abroad (e.g. Cemex) with other non-Mexican MNE (e.g. Ford Motor Company and Santander Bank).
Grupo Bimbo

This company, founded in 1945 by Don Lorenzo Servitje and 4 partners, has evolved from a local bakery to an international consortium of bread distributors. Its international expansion was not planned, at least initially, but the company later began a strategic restructuring of their international development.

Though they continue to open operations in new countries, decision-making remains centralized in Mexico and in the hands of Mexican managers. This helped the company transmit its values and culture. Corporate culture is a central element to all markets in which the company operates. Once the culture is consolidated in subsequent stages of growth, it begins to move into the hands of local managers.

In terms of branding, the company decided to preserve the "Bimbo" brand in all of its markets except in Chile, where they had to use another brand, “Ideal” – the “Bimbo” brand was already registered. Their approach to globalization is to develop a very local category by adapting their products and channels to the context of each country. From 2005 to the first quarter of 2011, Bimbo’s revenue growth reached 10.7% CAGR (Figure 1).

Kidzania

In mid-1990s, a group of young entrepreneurs led by Xavier Lopez Ancona identified a lack of offers for children’s entertainment in Mexico. After a thorough analysis of the entertainment industry’s status quo, they realized that the main trends setting the market’s pace in other parts of the world were family participation, interactivity, edutainment (term used to refer to the educational and entertainment centers where fun is offered to visitors, but also intellectual and human development by recreating real life challenges), and involving sponsors in funding comprehensive promotion opportunities.

In 1999, the first indoor entertainment center opened in Mexico City (originally branded as La Ciudad de los Niños), where kids could play like grown-ups in a fully operational replica city adapted to children’s scale.

Unlike Bimbo, KidZania’s international expansion arose from its founder’s strategic vision. KidZania’s expansion model pivots between centralized decision-making and decentralized use of franchises. By 2009, KidZania already had six entertainment centers around the world. Its first international franchise was opened in Tokyo, Japan. KidZania has received many awards and honors since opening operations.

With the success indicators from the first center in Mexico City, and with the consideration of expanding the business abroad, the company decided to pursue a re-branding strategy, changing their name to the easily identifiable KidZania. A universally known brand became one of the main challenges for the expansion plan (Figure 2 and 3, Table 2).

Key insights for international growth

The cases of Bimbo and KidZania helped us to identify 10 key insights about their international growth process:

Diagram or model internationalization

Studying the top 100 global Mexican companies confirms that there is no single model for internationalization. Some companies choose to buy brands, others export their business model and adapt to the local context, others buy factories but retain the same brand, and others prefer to develop a franchise model.

Bimbo’s first formal action in their globalization process was the acquisition of a plant in Guatemala. This was a true decision to internationalize, and they exported what they already knew how to do well in Mexico: branding and distribution. The natural area of growth was Latin America because it was thought that there were many similarities (based on a 2011 interview with Gabino Gómez Carbajal, General Director of Barcel).
A business model is a prerequisite for success in any internationalization process. In the case of KidZania, developing a win-win model was a crucial condition for embarking on its internationalization process. The model needed to create value for all stakeholders: partners, children, schools, and parents. The first opportunity for KidZania was not in the Latin American market, but with commercial partners in Japan.

Motivation for international expansion

We must consider what drives a company to want to conquer new markets. The three most common reasons are: the openness of the country, the company's strategy, and the attractiveness of the new market (underdeveloped markets are attractive, for instance, because there is an opportunity to develop consumer habits).

Bimbo was first motivated to internationalize in 1990 in order to protect itself against the opening of the U.S.-Mexico border as a result of the North American Free Trade Agreement. The main motivations in Bimbo's case were:

• Avoid being the target of large companies looking to buy them out. Bimbo did not want to sell, but keep growing.
• Seize the moment, because the world’s largest bakeries were concentrated in their countries.
• Becoming more competitive. In Mexico they had always occupied the first or second market position in all categories. Going abroad involved measuring how competitive the group really was.
• Learn about and seek out sources of innovation. Challenge the company to strengthen itself and provide feedback for the strategy and commercial model in Mexico.
• Benefit from the level of underdevelopment in the packaged bread products category.

For KidZania the idea of going beyond Mexico had long been discussed. Among KidZania’s founders, the motivation to internationalize was founded in success indicators from the first center (1999) in Mexico City. This success led them to eagerly consider the possibility of expanding the business to other locations, even abroad. The expansion plan first included additional locations in Mexico and introduction into the US market, which represented 50% of the global entertainment market.

An earlier study showed that, due to its population figures, the center could be appealing in 14 or 16 cities in the US. This market was home to the most sophisticated consumer – the one “who has seen it all” – and its appeal was greater visibility for the brand and as a platform for future expansion. Therefore, the plan was to open two centers in the short term, and to strengthen their relationship with business partners.

Strategic decision making process

There are many strategic decisions that make up the larger decision-making process. We believe the three most important are:

1) Adapt and select of products and services to be introduced to the market and their evolution;
2) Decide whether to centralize or to decentralize decision-making;
3) Select the countries you want to enter, either through knowledge of the area or through commercial synergies.

A company wanting to internationalize must decide from the very beginning how it will implement its decisions. Decisions can be centralized in the parent company, which allows for greater control and protection of corporate culture. Another strategic alternative is to delegate decision-making to the subsidiary, which will allow greater autonomy but can jeopardize the transmission of values and corporate practices. A third alternative is to develop a hybrid model where some of the strategic decisions are centralized and other tactical decisions are decentralized. Generally what happens is an evolution from a centralized to a hybrid with a trend toward greater decentralization. Country selection should be based on detected growth, maturity of different categories, and a specific target market share.

In the case of Bimbo, the company initially remained centralized. For example, up until 2001 the executive headquarters for Latin America were in Mexico City. It was not until 1991 that the first corporate office was created outside Mexico City and Gabino Gómez Carbajal was appointed as the first director of Latin America, who moved with his team to the first headquarters outside of Mexico.

Cities like Miami, Santiago, Buenos Aires and Sao Paulo were considered. Miami was a tempting option for logistical reasons, but the final choice was Buenos Aires because of the commercial challenge that market implied. A multi-country team was formed consisting of Argentines, Mexicans and collaborators from other countries in the region.
For the United States, Bimbo maintained a disjointed portfolio. At that time, their operations included Suandy, Pacific Pride (which maintained its own director) and another distributor in Texas. In addition, they maintained exports to Texas and California from Mexico. The result was operational inefficiency and financial losses. In this context, the company decided in 1998 to decouple the operation from Mexican corporate and create an independent structure to serve the North American market. The first manager was Juan Muldoon, whose previous experience in the region facilitated the business model's implementation in the United States.

In the case of KidZania, the idea was to replicate Mexico City's center – good location, spectacular design, sponsor sales, and search for capital – but with greater investment than in Mexico. The creators started looking for companies that could provide the necessary support, credibility, and recognition within the U.S. market.

During this process, directors from two well-known groups of companies, leading companies in the risk capital industry, and strong investors in media and entertainment suggested that brand growth should begin outside the US. They explained that even if they could get good investment proposals, it was better to wait so as to protect the initial investors. The new required investment was very high, and if anything went wrong the founders would lose everything. So, they decided not to take any chances, and the decision was made to consolidate the brand in Mexico with its own funds and start expansion abroad using a franchise model. The American market would be revisited in 3 to 5 years by means of a strategic partnership.

In an interview with the authors, Xavier López Ancona said: "We decided to go for international markets outside the U.S. as it would be easier to create value-added conditions to get in. Otherwise, any other agreement would be less fair for us. We would not get into the American market with franchises or on our own, our priority would be to search for a key partner with credibility and who supports the growth through different means, web site, TV, radio, etc."

Role of market intelligence

Market research plays a key role in developing and implementing tactical strategies in an internationalization plan. The information they generate can create market intelligence and modify the elements of the marketing mix according to conditions in the market the company wishes to penetrate. By conducting market research, Bimbo was able to identify the moments of consumption for fresh bread, because not all countries are developed equally in terms of consumption. For example, in Central America bread is eaten at breakfast, in Chile in the afternoon with tea, in Brazil at breakfast and with afternoon coffee, in Argentina exclusively at breakfast, and in Peru consumption is sporadic. In Mexico, sweet bread is consumed in the evening or at breakfast.

In 1990, Bimbo conducted a series of studies on perception of the Bimbo brand in Texas and California. The result was clear: the majority of the Hispanic population knew of and had consumed Bimbo products. There was a great asset in the brand. Later it was discovered that in predominately Anglo areas, consumers expressed confidence in the brand upon seeing the iconic Bimbo bear on the package. What followed was the end of local brands and a migration toward the Bimbo and Marinela brands for the portfolio of products marketed in these regions.

In the case of KidZania, all implementation decisions are based on market intelligence. From the very beginning, the company's main principle was to always involve children, and to take their ideas, preferences, and wishes into consideration. Also, it was important to research the major trends in the entertainment industry like participation, edutainment, shoppertainment, local entertainment, novelty, and innovation.

Impact of Distribution Channels

Designing distribution channels in new markets involves detailed analysis of the cost structure and a deep understanding of consumer behavior. Each country has very specific contexts and logistical challenges. The channel strategy used by KidZania in the local market has been replicated in other countries. However, in the case of Bimbo’s channel strategy, it had to be flexibly adapted to each market.

Bimbo had to learn to break the paradigm so that the business model would work the same way in all Latin American countries. They adjusted the distribution model so the sales fleet was not necessarily their own, and they were unable attend personally to all retailers as they had in Mexico. The company suffered from these differences in distribution in other countries.

In Mexico, Bimbo was the focus of the retail channel, with personalized and exclusive attention for all retailers. In other countries it was impossible to replicate this model, and for the first time in Bimbo’s history, they had to identify new clients using distributors and intermediaries. For example, in Brazil and Chile the dominant channel was the modern channel. The low volume of displaced products in some categories prevented them from making traditional channel routes profitable.

In Brazil, Grupo Bimbo stopped changing the strategy and focused on other types of customers. The company they had acquired in this country mainly catered to larger clients, and was not involved in the retail channel. Bimbo consequently had to strengthen itself in the modern channel and work to make advances in the retail channel without losing the presence they already had. In Argentina Bimbo opted for the modern channel, which is the dominant channel in that country.

The business strategy had to be redesigned in order to achieve expansion goals and jumpstart growth through franchising in the KidZania case. First, they had to look for a country and examine the profiles of potential franchisees. Four to five candidates would be assessed for each franchise, and they would have to travel to Mexico to get to know the concept and familiarize themselves with operations. Once they had narrowed it down to one or two finalists, KidZania would perform a final evaluation, and then choose an ideal location in the country and plan the opening of the center.

After the final decision was made, it took 18 months to design and construct the center, and then conduct a pilot opening. A market analysis process was designed which included a thorough study of the location, size, and potential of the city/country where the franchise would be set up, as well as the location’s capacity to encourage the success indicators.

Capacity (do) versus skills (analyze)

To succeed in international expansion, it is essential to know how to develop both corporate and local talent. This requires a detailed plan of the capabilities that will allow the company to grow internationally, and of the analytical competencies managers need to read market signals. This section focuses on capabilities on two levels: internal and external.

The case of KidZania is of particular relevance because of the role of its franchisees. Early on, it was difficult for KidZania to get the brands to believe in the project. How did they gain the trust of their advertisers?

According to Xavier Lopez himself, one of the keys was: "Putting together a good team, with great people that were always attentive to what the market demanded..."
We see here again the importance of developing skills and talent. All franchisees come to Mexico to receive training at KidZania University, and then take their know-how back to their own country. Not every entrepreneur can join the KidZania network. The circle of profit is generated from the training franchisees receive in our country, and the inclusion of the cultural manifestations of each culture.

For Bimbo, one key element of their business model is their company’s philosophy. Spreading the company’s values and mission is its main purpose. It is common for functional managers in each region to gain experience in several countries previous to their appointment. As the General Manager of Bimbo’s Latin America Organization says, “We search for values that drive people to obtain good results.”

Resources allocation

This insight emphasizes the importance of linking the business model to profitability. Here the company decides where it wants to place priority. In Bimbo’s case, the central axis is creating a solid corporate culture, and the focus of their core business is making bread and developing their secondary business units like baked goods and snacks.

For KidZania the priority was allocating the resources necessary to build the brand. KidZania’s founders said: “A sound, easily-identified brand is essential for consolidating the business. Creating a universal, well-known brand became one of the main challenges for the expansion plan.” In order to achieve this the company hired US marketing and brands expert Adrianne Weiss.

Relevance of innovation

The engine of internationalization is undoubtedly innovation, and global expansion is impossible without it. Innovation must be understood here both at the level of products/services, and at the level of operational processes and variety of business models.

For example, one of Bimbo’s main internationalization objectives is to learn about and discover sources of innovation. It seeks to challenge the company and provide constant feedback for its business model in Mexico. One example is their use of channels in the United States, through which they have acquired logistics techniques that they have replicated in other countries.
Innovation is also reflected in the business model. As discussed in the first insight, adapting different business models is itself a source of innovation for the company. Bimbo had to innovate to develop different business models based on local conditions in each market.

Another insight Bimbo learned was that it needed to accept that a successful business model implemented in Mexico must be flexibly adjusted to local conditions in each market. The business model consisting of a broad portfolio of products, intensive distribution, and development of the traditional channel had to be adapted to another business model with less variety of products, tropicalized flavors, and mixed distribution models.

In the case of KidZania, Xavier Lopez says the key to their business lies in "constantly innovating and not succumbing to failure." Innovation is seen in the various aspects of its strategy. For example, we can see it in KidZania's organizational structure (the positions are similar to that of a presidential cabinet) as well as in how they market the spaces in their entertainment center through business partners, recognized brands, and their loyalty program.

Creation and development of a global brand

A crucial element in international expansion strategy is the development of a global brand as the beginning of a union between the organization and its customers. There must be general lines of communication with respected sources in order to identify what is the common factor that can give the brand the same meaning throughout a region.

Although the goal for Grupo Bimbo is to globalize their brand, entering new markets through acquisitions has forced the company to carefully analyze the acquired brand value and convenience of maintaining it. There have been cases where the local brand can be replaced, and where it is appropriate to initiate a transitional stage. They get value from brand acquisition because it provides a product with which the consumer is already familiar.

The most important thing in terms of best practices for them was the diagnosis. In Brazil, for example, it would have been a big mistake to migrate rapidly due to the local strength of its brands.

Because the strength of the brand is different in each country, it is impossible to think about a regional brand campaign. For KidZania, building global brand awareness is a priority in their expansion strategy. The brand change implemented in 2006 sought a complete renovation of the concept and the visitor experience. It was supported by new storytelling that encouraged cohesion among all the franchisees throughout the world. Environments, stories, and characters were exported and thus become a global brand and image.

Transformation to stop dependence on domestic sales

When a company no longer relies on its initial sales market, it can truly begin to see itself as a global company. In the case of Bimbo, 55% of sales are in the US market and 45% come from the local Mexican market. In terms of profitability, however, the Mexican market is still more important than the American market. If we regionally analyze opportunities for Bimbo in Latin America, they exist in taking over remaining market spaces. In the United States, it can consolidate its presence and business model, and in Asia it can take advantage of generational change, and leverage changes in habits and market size. In the case of KidZania, 89.1% of the attendance at parks is outside the Mexican market (see Table 2).

Limitations and further research

Few companies from emerging markets have been successful in pursuing an internationalization expansion and building a global brand. This research has studied two successful companies that pursued that goal. We used a longitudinal analysis (10 year) of these companies and their strategies, to understand how they were able to become a global player.

This was an exploratory research motivated by the following research questions: How have Mexican companies achieved international expansion? Which are the different paths that they followed? Which variables become important for their international expansion? What product portfolio, brands, and business model should they globalize or standardize?

We acknowledge that generalizations from this research are difficult to draw, given the limited size of the sample and its constraint to the Mexican context. Thus, strategic insights presented in this paper might be useful to other companies from emerging markets in designing their strategies. Some important variables have been identified (e.g., resource allocation, distribution channels, meaning of a global brand, etc.) as relevant for the design and execution of an international strategy. How are these variables impacting an entire ecosystem, such as building local presence, establishing joint ventures or alliances with local companies, recruiting local talent, developing new business models, reshaping the value proposition, developing new brands or introducing traditional ones with a local flavor, and understanding the supply chain and routes to market. Therefore, further research needs to be done to systematize and confirm these findings.

Future research attempts should extend the generalizations drawn from the results found in this study, selecting comparable companies from same industry, similar in size and length of time in business. An empirical approach should follow this qualitative exploratory first stage of the research.

Conclusion and practical implications

Globalization changes and intensifies the demands on managers. Few companies from emerging markets have grown into successful multinational enterprises. Studying the cases of Grupo Bimbo and KidZania provides us with some key insights that can inspire other companies interested in successfully expanding internationally.

It is necessary to consider what drives a company to conquer new markets:

a) The level of openness of the new market
b) The strategy of the company
c) The attractiveness of the new market.

The diversity and dynamism of individual countries makes it difficult to propose a one-size-fits-all approach. The complexity of international marketing suggests the need to adopt a broader perspective of the understanding of marketing principles. This perspective should capture the richness and diversity of different aspects of culture and their influence, as well as the impact of technology, advertising, socio-political, economic, and legal systems, on the international strategy. There are vast differences in business philosophy and practices between emerging and developed markets that require carefully reflection (McKinsey & Company, 2011). The aspects that must be considered go far beyond just simply selecting a market. Developing an international plan and marketing strategy is crucial. As Buzzell (1968) anticipated: “operations abroad have become so extensive and so complex as to require significant changes in organization and operating methods”.

Khanna et al. (2005) argue that CEOs and senior leadership teams of MNCs acknowledge that globalization, or regionalization, is the most critical challenge they face today. They have also become very aware of the difficulty in the selection of which countries to do business with and then identifying internationalization strategies suitable to that country.

Still most companies have stuck with the strategies they've traditionally developed and implemented; which emphasize standardized approaches to new markets, while sometimes experimenting with a few local changes.

The critical question remains as to whether or not it is possible to develop a standardized marketing strategy. According to Buzzel (1968) there are possibilities and limitations for an integrated approach to multinational marketing. What becomes very important is to understand market characteristics and then adapt to them. Differences in customer needs and preferences, in competition, in distribution channels, etc., shape the decision-making process and the definition of how to set priorities in the resource allocation process.

We learned from these two companies, Grupo Bimbo and KidZania, that both of them were constantly investing in innovation. That is an interesting insight, given that normally companies in emerging markets are focused on their domestic markets and tend to imitate the products that MNE brands sell. If emerging market brands want to become true global players they need to be positioned differently. They have to pursue a differentiation strategy in the global arena, evoking emotions, not only functional quality, in their products (Steenkamp, 2014). A strong global brand should have both logic and magic.

Consumers will increasingly be looking for the best brands from around the world, regardless of where they originated. We know that one of the dimensions that support brand equity is the perceived quality of the products or services. Emerging markets’ brands need to migrate from poor quality to premium products in order to conquer global markets. Positioning products and services as a premium brand should be a strategic decision. Both of our studied companies, since their foundation had a clear vision in terms of delivering an excellent product and service to their target consumers. Brand building played a very important role in their international expansion. So, brand excellence is a must for any company seeking an international expansion. The path to become a global brand will not be an easy one and will require an ample marketing budget.

The strategic insights presented in this paper have emerged in the Mexican context but can also be useful to other companies in emerging markets. We can also draw some lessons from MNEs in developed countries. These developing markets, with young and growing populations, will increasingly become not only the focus of rising consumption and production but also major providers of capital, talent, and innovation. Capturing the opportunities offered by growth in emerging markets will often require retooling existing business models, adapting to local conditions, and reconfiguring price/value equations.

Underserved developing markets are not only attractive for emerging economy brands, but also for the West’s great brands, that have not yet reached those areas. Thus, emerging economy brands as well as Western brands will be competing together in the same market. As Kumar and Steenkamp (2013) mentioned “Western firms who fail to look over their shoulder for these fast-approaching emerging market global brands will be making a fatal mistake”

Therefore, international expansion implies a learning process, and trial and error is common and useful. The challenge for companies after conquering new markets is to successfully transfer the enhanced processes and new skills acquired to strengthen the whole organization, both locally and abroad.

Even though there is great potential for emerging market companies to follow an international expansion strategy, there are some realities that these companies need to be aware of and then overcome –limited resources being among the most important of these. Firms in emerging markets often struggle with limited budgets and unrealistic expectations. Another is the lack of marketing capabilities. In order to be successful in foreign markets it is very important to develop marketing skills within these organizations and in line with the different markets.

In the end, becoming a global player is all about cultural adaptation and having the right pool of talent. In an interview, KidZania’s CEO mentioned that one of his greatest challenges was transmitting KidZania’s values and culture to his own staff, and in order to achieve that goal, he required top management teams to have a global mindset. In the case of Bimbo, however, their CEO has stressed: “for us, principles –the common culture that we want to have within our company, and our ethics. These are the cornerstones of our business. They go wherever the company goes”. This does not mean that Bimbo is unaware of adapting its products to different markets, but having an embedded culture within the company gives stability to the brand.
